Rather it calls for the drug approval of certain medicines that can be used only if another procedure — commonly called a C-section — is a viable option. Women of childbearing age with a uterus and cervix may want to opt for the C-sections when their primary mode of birth control fails or becomes unavailable. The new FDA proposal also does not ban the sale of abortifacients, for which no specific guidelines are given. This would be in contrast to the restrictions placed by a previous House of Representatives effort that required a woman to ask her doctor for the information. Doctors can choose to prescribe abortifacients that are either made from animal cells — meaning they produce the same physical characteristics — or are derived from human cells. The FDA states that, for "medical products intended for implantation, this treatment option is not available." It goes on to say that this "option is not available" to women who would rather have a C-section than another form of birth control. They can, however, choose abortion instead, although there are additional health risks associated. It was. 44ad931eb4 CRACK Adobe Acrobat Pro DC 2015.023.20056 Incl Patch
